Alex,

This is such helpful information! A few notes back at ya:

Ahrefs = I have played with the content gap in ahrefs as you suggested. I looked at what sites MM was not ranking for but thetstreet.com was. I've got to play with it a bit more to understand impactful takeaways.

URLs = Absolutely understand how carefully permalink changes need to be completed - honestly it's one reason I could never think about removing the date. However WP has come out with more ways to customize tehse permalinks so right now our devs are looking at how to write something into our theme that allows the user to publish a story using the date OR category.

Structure = EXCELLENT info to know about the repeat phrase. This does make it a bit tricky to think through. Even if I do /retirement/types-of-xxxx, at some point I'll have a retirement story and and that would again be repeating the name. I'll need to think on these directory options a bit more but pls pass on any recommendations you have.

Again, cannot thank you enough for all your help and feedback. This is invaluable!

Katie

Hi Katie,

I think those topics are fine. If you need TONS more ideas, I would highly recommend using the new "Content Gap" feature inside Ahrefs.com - it's unbelievably awesome. Forgive me if I've written about this already to you, but here's what it does.

* When you use "Content Gap", you simply put in your own domain (MM) and then 3 of your top competitors.

It then finds ALL keywords that MM isn't ranking but at least one (or more) of your competitors are.

In other words, if one of your competitors are ranking for 1k keyphrases that MM isn't, it'll display those...and ranking data on that.

It probably saves hundreds of hours of research and is instantaneous. My recommendation is to get stuck into those as soon as you've exhausted your other lists.

URL's - if you're going to change from "date" > "no date" - which I highly recommend - just make sure that it IF it does change all of your previous posts that 301 redirects are in place. Personally, I think it would be better to leave those URL's with dates in them "as-is" to avoid thousands of 301 redirects...and then going fwd just remove the date from the URL.

Finally, regarding your proposal for URL structures...in general I like the idea. I think if you're consistently blogging about a certain topic (e.g. Long Term Investments) then they should go into their own directory. But - please avoid the double inclusion of the same keyphrase.

E.g. this is not a good one:

</long-term-investments/types-of-long-term-investments/>

You want to avoid having "long-term-investments" in there twice as it won't be well received by Google.

Hope that helps!

Alex,

On the phone we agreed you would outline the next best targets for us to go after. Since editorial has to keep pumping out content we outlined some keywords they could work on while we identify new targets. What do you think of these?

I'd like to try diverting from our post permalink structure of moneymorning.com/date/story-title/ and use categories for the below targets because most of them are evergreen and by removing the date we could keep them updated and relevant over a long period of time. Of course we can do that now even though the date is in the url but it just becomes confusing for users... can't prove it, just a theory.

To show you what I was thinking I've marked in red how I was thinking of structuring these posts. What do you think?

Hi Katie,

Thank you for our call today.

As promised, I'm sending you the spreadsheet that contains a list of new title tags (and their associated pages of course) as well as the 301 redirects that need to be implemented.

Any questions - please let me know!

Thanks a lot,

Alex Miller
